Foreword

Welcome to the third gathering Asia and the Jewish World: A Global Leadership Conversation.

Reading recently about Shanghai's rich Jewish history, the magazine article first startled, and then haunted. Writing in The Atlantic (21/11/13) James Griffith noted: "When the Second World War broke out in 1939, more European Jews had taken refuge in Shanghai than in any other city in the world." That startled. But here's what haunted: "Aside from the Dominican Republic, Shanghai was the only place that remained open to these refugees, and 20,000 or so ... found their way to the city in the late 1930s". Just 20,000. Who knows how many more could have, should have, been saved?

There are, of course, many contemporary reasons why a conversation on "Israel, Asia, and the Jewish Future" in the 21st century should meet in Shanghai, having first come together in Hong Kong (2014) and Singapore (2015). But one reason, certainly, is that the city is so richly linked to the Jewish past.

More broadly, however, in speaking to the world with its 24 million population – equal to all of Australia's – Shanghai dominates the story which China presents about its own future. And increasingly that story matters to Israel, whose economic, political and diplomatic ties to China have grown dramatically in the past five years. But as we'll hear at this gathering, Israel's pivot to Asia extends well beyond China, to include India, Japan and South East Asia. What the Jewish State's historic shift to the East means, and how it will impact the Jewish Diaspora, is not yet fully grasped, let alone understood.

Which is why, in our own small way, we've come together again with our partners—Australian Jewish Funders and the Jewish Funders Network - to try to make some sense of it all, as viewed through "the prism of Jewish philanthropy", another way of saying through "the prism of a global people."

Once again I'm grateful to Tracie Olcha, the AJF's CEO and point person, and again this gatherings driving force. Indefatigably creative and innovative, Tracie "makes it happen". And my thanks, too, to the JFN's President Andres Spokoiny for championing the idea from the beginning, his ongoing involvement, and for encouraging us to persist. Somehow we've made it three in a row. I guess that makes it "a tradition."
